Following the study of language and mass communication in Part 1, I wished to create awareness of the potential of educational and ideological influence of the media. The media has increasingly become a platform which reinforces cultural beliefs, and projects strong views on how we should look, that we as individuals often knowingly or unknowingly validate and perpetuate. For this written task, I will explore on the way advertisements shape public opinion, and decided to write a newspaper article about the dangers of stereotypes that could be featured in popular newspapers such as The New York Times, which gather millions of well educated readers each year.

I intend to target parents with young children who are more exposed to gender stereotypes in their childhood. I will be looking at an advertisement by GAP in 2016, a popular worldwide clothing and accessories retailer. Most clothing stores separate their clothes based on gender, and the designs based on which are deemed to be more masculine or feminine. Similarly, GAP showed a boy on one side, labelled 'The Little Scholar' and a girl on another side labelled 'The Social Butterfly'. GAP has perpetuated a very bad principal and has sparked lots of outrage among the public.

This problem should be improved as girls can be scholars and boys can be sociable. Therefore, I will explain how the advertisement uses designs and captions to highlight the generalizations and stereotypes of young girls and boys, showing how this is still prevalent in our modern society. Through these effects created on the audience, I can further discuss the potential mental health consequences on children which connects to them on an emotional level. As parents, to prevent these mental problems on their children, they will instinctively support the article and make a change to this stereotypical society.

GENDER STEREOTYPES ARE DESTROYING GIRLS AND THEY'RE KILLING BOYS

Consequences of Gender Stereotypes

It does not matter where in the world you live. Across the world, from Beijing to Baltimore, children are straitjacketed into gender roles in early adolescence. The onset of adolescence triggers a common set of rigidly enforced gender expectations associated with increased lifelong risks of mental and physical health problems.

SEEN

From toys to clothing to behavior, parents and schools reinforce the myths that girls are vulnerable, seen as potential targets and victims while boys are viewed as strong and independent individuals. These oversimplified characterizations keep playing out repeatedly.

According to the new Common Sense Media report, a lifetime of viewing stereotypical media becomes so ingrained that it can ultimately affect kids' career choices, self-worth, relationships, and ability to achieve their full potential. Many parents are concerned about these issues as well. After a poll done during the report, it found out that nearly 1000 parents across the U.S. believe the media has a significant influence on their kids, from how girls should look and behave to how seeing violence can affect boys' beliefs about themselves.

SE

"How you perceive girls and boys is socially driven. It's not biologically driven," Kristen Mmari said, an associate professor at Johns Hopkins Bloomberg School of Public Health and the lead qualitative researcher on the study of Adolescent Health.

In one image, a little boy is seen modelling in grey tracksuit bottoms with a navy shirt, blue and green checkered top with a denim jacket as the last layer. Most of the colors are dark and dull, representing power and masculinity. In contrast, the girl is dressed in a light-yellow top, which signifies liveliness and energy – relating back to her labelled status as a 'social butterfly'. Usually, children wear bright colors but here you can see that this is not true for the boy. Was it Gap's intention to portray boys as the more mature gender?

Moreover, the boy's shirt has Albert Einstein's face and name printed on it, generalizing that boys are more educated and smarter compared to girls. This contradicts with the pink 'G' labelled on the girl's shirt. Pink, by society, is considered the official color for little girls and portrays a feminine trait. GAP also attempted to dehumanize the girl by letting her wear the cat ears headband. Cats, especially kittens, are usually associated with innocence.

The boy also portrays an upright and confident posture, implying that males are more dominant and reliable than females. The girl, on the other hand, bends her legs and appears to be leaning against the wall, showing that she is weak and needs someone stronger to support and depend on.

Under 'The Little Scholar', Gap inserted a caption 'Your future starts here. Shirts + graphic tees = genius', whereas the girl is described to be "the talk of the playground." Is Gap trying to say that girls are not intelligent and will not have a future? The phrase 'talk of the playground' is a reference to 'talk of the town', meaning popular, so do girls exist just to look attractive?

The Global Early Adolescent Study found that many of these stereotypes are universal, and they become entrenched before 10 years old.

Among consequences that the study noted when girls conform to gender stereotypes:

- Depression
- Child marriage
- Leaving school early
- Exposure to violence

And for boys:

- Engaging in physical violence to a much greater extent than girls
- Dying more frequently from unintentional injuries
- Being more prone to substance abuse and suicide

The study calls it the hegemonic myth: the perception that men are the dominant sex while women need to be protected. This idea starts in early childhood, reinforced by schools, parents and media.

While boys, men described having the freedom to come and go as they please to pursue education and other opportunities, girls found their mobility and access to education restricted. As they enter adolescence, silence and modesty are instilled as desirable values in society, as girls are pressed to behave in a "modest fashion." This phenomenon has led to numerous cascading cultural perceptions.

Fortunately, the most powerful messages children absorb are from you, parents. When parents actively role-model gender equality, speak out against stereotypes, and challenge outdated ideas, kids will hear that loud and clear.

Parents have control over their kids' media mostly when they are little, but even as they grow. Choose quality media that reflects parental values, - how?

Around ages 8-12, kids would start attributing to certain qualities to both genders and feel self-conscious about physical changes, pressurizing them to conform to cultural gender norms. As a parent, recognize characters who defy gender stereotypes. Check out a movie such as Big Hero 6 and say, "It's alright to show when you're sad, boys should not be embarrassed to cry." Also, emphasize that worth and happiness do not come from appearance or from physical strength. Comment positively on healthy, supporting and fulfilling cross-gender friendships.

Researchers say interventions to change gender stereotyping need to happen at a much earlier age. By the age of 10, it can be too late. "Adolescent health risks are shaped by behaviors rooted in gender roles that can be well established in kids by the time they are 10 or 11.

SEEN

"Yet we see billions of dollars around the world invested in adolescent health programs that don't kick in until they are 15, and by then it's probably too late to make a big difference." said Mmari.

Now, Times readers – we have the power to influence and make a change to our children's lives. We can do our part to shape our future generation so they do not fall into this pit. Mothers, let us work together to end gender discrimination once and for all.
